AN HISTORICAL SKETCH OF TRINITY COLLEGE, GLASGOW.

1856—1929

By the Very Rev. PRINCIPAL MACGREGOR, D.D.

At the Disruption Assembly of 1843 the New College in Edinburgh was sanctioned, and in October of that year, in temporary premises, it began its great career; but, though nothing had been said, both Glasgow and Aberdeen took it as obvious that they must have Colleges also. The two Presbyteries arranged for instruction of students by competent ministers, so that only one or two winters in Edinburgh should be required, and already in 1844 Mr. Ewing of Strathleven bequeathed £5000 for "the Free Church College intended to be erected in Glasgow." Aberdeen lay far from the capital, and it served a province where many of the students were nobly poor, so it was first considered, and in 1846 a College was opened there, with one professor to provide a partial curriculum. Even this shy beginning aroused suspicion. The Free Church had undertaken vast responsibilities in many directions, and New College, whose foundation stone was only laid that year, seemed to many a quite sufficient burden for the Church to carry. Dr. Cunningham had conceived of a school of theology more generously staffed than that of any of the universities, and he contended that, whilst the provinces might provide preparatory courses, there should be in Edinburgh one pattern institution for the whole country. Dr. Candlish, who knew the whole Church better, took another view, and battle was joined between the "Limitarians" and the "Extensionists." Our fathers were mighty men, who brought more of vital energy into debate than we do, but they did not keep their tempers as well, and this controversy grew so hot that, for a while, all friendly relations between Candlish and Cunningham ceased. In 1848 the Presbyteries pronounced in favour of extension, but the Assembly, by 189 to 126, declared that "the Church is not called upon at present to establish another full Divinity Hall." The majority of ministers favoured extension, but the elders, more sensitive to financial considerations, mustered three to one against it.

For several years the question was now allowed to sleep, but in 1855 a notable group of Glasgow laymen approached the Assembly with a definite proposal. Dr. William Clark of Wester Moffat had offered £30,000 if a like amount was subscribed by others: the needed money had been promised and a site secured, so that work could at once go forward. So splendid an offer could not be rejected, and in 1856 the College began under the presidency of Dr. Patrick Fairbairn, a man of noble presence and of character and endowments not less noble. Dr. James Gibson was his sole colleague in 1856, but in 1857, Dr. Hetherington and Mr. George Douglas were added. To us it now seems odd that a professor to teach the New Testament was not then considered necessary. Apparently anybody was sufficient for that, and certainly Fairbairn was equipped for this as for every other task.

The beginnings were quickly clouded. The Entrance Class of 24 students included several bright and vigorous intelligences. Archibald Henderson and Robert Howie, John Fraser of Brechin and James Nicol of St. Stephen's, Glasgow, and others like them, and though Dr. Gibson was a man of kindly nature, he was too choleric and pugnacious to be patient with the immaturities and audacities of youth. Unfortunately he also lacked the gift of consuming his own smoke, so Church Courts and Committees of Enquiry were called in to adjudicate upon the behaviour and the opinions of a group of lads. Howie was angrily charged with laughing in the front bench at the lectures, and answered, with a fine candour, that, if he laughed, it could not be at the lectures, since he did not listen to them. Henderson was accused of making caricatures of the professor in class, and replied that these were not caricatures but portraits—a distinction without much of difference. But the real burden of the complaint was the character of the opinions expressed in some of the class essays. When Gibson's distressed suspicions were awakened he seems deliberately to have chosen subjects in which to catch the men tripping. The poor lads were surprisingly and edifyingly orthodox, but they strove in vain to satisfy the standards imposed by their professor. Their sentences were torn from their connections, and scrutinised both in what they said and in what they failed to say. A brisk discharge of pamphlets broke out from both sides, and high debate was held in General Assembly (when Rainy made his first determining appearance) on the theology of students' exercises. The situation was ridiculous and was bad for everybody. Poor Howie confessed that the whole first session "was lost and worse than lost, for mental energies were dissipated and a distaste created for the noblest of studies." By and by, the students concerned passed out to render abundant service to the Church, and the kindly, irascible professor found outlets for all his love of battle in the long war about union with the United Presbyterians, which raged from 1863 until after he had entered into peace in 1871.

The incident did not help the reputation of the College. The classes were never big, for Edinburgh, as the premier institution, with all the prestige of famous names attaching to it, drew students from every part of the country. But as one reads the lists it is not possible to miss the largeness of the contribution which, from the first, was made by our College to the British Dominions and to the mission field. Of the seventeen men who entered in 1858 seven went to the Colonies and one as missionary to Budapest, and out of the first eight years four men were chosen for Colonial Professorships, which suggests that it is not a bad thing for the world when a Church trains more men than are needed to fill its own pulpits. class of 1873 John Gibson went to Swatow, Dugald Mackichan to Bombay, Thomas Barclay to Formosa—three conspicuous figures in missionary annals. Ten years later came Alick Bain of Livingstonia, that heroic figure whose effigy adorns our upper gallery : to whom, at the unveiling of the tablet, Denney applied Paul's burning words—"If any do enquire about Titus or the brethren, they are the messengers of the Churches, they are the glory of Christ." A little later comes James Macphail of Santalia, followed soon by men yet living like Nicol Macnicol and Donald Fraser and Campbell Moody and Bulloch Douglas ; and the noble register is ever lengthening. The college has borne its share in the task of furnishing scholars and thinkers to the Church, amongst whom Denney, Moffatt, and M'Fadyen are pre-eminent, and at present six out of the fifteen chairs in our Church Colleges are held by Glasgow men. But the supreme task of such a school is to produce pastors and preachers, and any College might be proud to be able to point to men of such various distinction as James Nicol and John Mackay of Cromarty—that great Highland evangelist, J. P. Struthers and his friend Grant of Greenock, and John Carroll of St. John's. In a single decade the College gave us John MacNeill and William Muir, Hugh Black and George Morrison, Harry Miller and Roderick Macleod. And some of those who have recently left our Hall might match the best of them.

As Professor Gibson died at the beginning of a session (1871), temporary arrangements had to be made, and Thomas Martin Lindsay, an Edinburgh student of extraordinary distinction, was appointed to conduct the classes. His predecessor's lectures were put at his disposal, but, like David with Saul's armour, he had "not proved them," and he "put them off him." Sometimes in loyalty he tried to slip one in, but the students were quick to recognise, and ceased to take notes ; so Lindsay had for himself to face the task, with some help from Rainy, and it was felt that a new day had come. Dr. Islay Burns died in May, 1872, so that the Assembly of that year was able to appoint both Lindsay and James Candlish. Three years later came Bruce, and then Glasgow could afford to hold up its head. Justice has never been done to James Candlish, who struck outsiders as an odd, archaic figure, with mental processes as ungainly as his bodily movements ; but he was a vital theological thinker, and in addition to the most amazing learning he possessed an unfailing candour and courage of mind. If the Scriptural evidence was not clear, he said so, and he never wrested Scripture to the support of his own opinion or of the Church's doctrine. He was paralysingly shy ; but when he forced himself to speak on some big issue in Church Courts, it was as if righteousness itself had spoken. For many of us Bruce appeared as the epoch-maker, revealing to them "the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ" ; and he did this for more than his own students. He affected Christian thought throughout Scotland. People sometimes now complain that they find little which is novel in his books, but this is largely because ideas which first were his have become a part of the general stock of our thinking. With restless activity Lindsay for many years dispersed himself over wide fields—land politics, university education for women, Church administration, and much else—everywhere doing vivid and distinguished work; but when assaults of illness increasingly hampered him he concentrated on his historical studies, and his great books were written. In 1879 the College welcomed a half-exotic decoration in the coming of Henry Drummond, like a kind of fairy prince, to discourse on Natural Science. Even he did not succeed in making the subject seem to the students essential in the curriculum: he gave snippets of Botany and a little more of Geology, with abundant lectures on larger scientific theories and their impacts on the Faith: he led the men out on excursions to Arran and elsewhere, to see moraines and seek for fossils. But though all of this was charmingly done, it scarcely gripped the mind. Professor Tait of Edinburgh once caustically defined popular lecturing as an exercise in which a man who understands a subject imperfectly helps others to talk about it without understanding it at all; and though the first part of the epigram did not apply to Drummond, the second certainly did apply to most of his students. He had a few intimate friends, but he lived a curiously detached life in a big house close to the College, and his main evangelistic interest was always in Edinburgh. Twice over he attempted to break into the student life of Glasgow, but on each occasion those who questioned his orthodoxy threatened rival meetings, so he silently drew back. Thus very few of his students came really to know him, but they all confessed his charm and his power. He was nobly kind; he possessed in perfection the gift of capturing speech, and he had the art of dominating men and eliciting their secrets, without ever betraying anything of his own. Secretum meum mihi—my secret is my own, was certainly his guiding rule. In 1892 George Adam Smith succeeded the good George Douglas, and then the Faculty was in its glory, with such a combination of quality as no theological College in Britain could exhibit.

The closing years of the century brought grievous losses to the College. Within four days of each other, in 1897, Candlish and Drummond died, and two years later Bruce followed them. But a new chapter was then opening. James Denney, already a notable figure on both sides of the Atlantic, was appointed to succeed Candlish, the first of Glasgow's students to hold a professorship under the Church. He taught Dogmatic greatly, and his lectures on the work and the life of the minister made an extraordinary mark on many who heard them; but at the Union of 1900 he was transferred to Bruce's Chair of New Testament Interpretation, and there his principal work was done. Dr. Orr, with his massive learning and his large simplicity, became responsible for Dogmatic and Apologetic, and once again the Faculty was resplendent. Lindsay, Smith, Orr, Denney were all of them men of world-wide reputation, and troops of students from overseas braved the Glasgow fogs to profit by their teaching. And the Faculty was more than a group of eminent individuals; Robertson Nicoll, after a visit, reported of the College that "every little thing is looked after: the professors are all affectionate friends, without any jealousy of each other: the students are devoted to their teachers and are eager to do anything for them." It sounds almost too idyllic, and yet in large measure it is true of the situation to-day.

The Union of 1900 brought one distinct enrichment to the College in securing a separate Chair of Practical Training and Christian Ethics. This came over from the United Presbyterian Hall, and was occupied by Dr. Hislop, a man loved and consulted by many. Hitherto the work had been shared between the professors of Dogmatic and Church History, for both of whom it had necessarily tended to be a subordinate interest; but under Dr. Hislop, followed by Dr. Clow, the subject came more nearly to its rights. Yet on this side the College has always suffered from its lack of a properly equipped Institute of Practical Training in which, under the guidance of the Professor or a competent Warden, the men might see how mission work, in all its departments, ought to be done. Experiments have been made in various districts of the city. When Cranstonhill Church was being started fifty years ago, the students worked there, then they passed to the help of Cowcaddens when things were at their lowest, then they removed to a derelict church in Carrick Street where George Adam Smith was for years the inspiring leader in everything. But when he had left Glasgow, stint and makeshift increasingly appeared, until the students lost heart and resolved on removal. The Missionary Society have gallantly carried on in Lancefield, but they are looking eagerly to the Presbytery to effect such a new grouping of the Church's activities in that district as may give them room for more profitable and educative service.

Stage by stage, through these seventy-four years, the college buildings have had to be enlarged. The first addition was the big room in which Drummond taught, which for long has been familiarly known as our College Dining-room. When the Church next door was burned, Lindsay had the courage to acquire the roofless hulk, and remodel it at a total cost of almost £20,000, which was raised by his own unsparing effort. This gave us a dignified Library, a hall for our larger College assemblies, a Gymnasium and two class-rooms, and much else, whilst the old library was divided into two other spacious rooms. The reconstructed building was opened free of debt in October, 1911. Three or four years ago, at the instigation of the students, one of the new rooms was set apart as a Chapel in which our daily service is held; nothing has yet been done to adapt or furnish this room for its purpose, and this, along with other adjustments in the buildings, must soon be taken in hand. If the College, as we hope, is to be the centre of the Theological Faculty of the University, provision must be made for larger classes than in the past, which will call for some adaptation and refurnishing. But just as the splendid generosity of the founders has been fully justified by the output of the College in decade after decade, so any fresh expenditure for fitting the buildings for more various use will bring profit to Scotland and to the world. It should not be forgotten that, in consequence of the House of Lords' Decision of 1904, £33,000 of our too scanty endowments had to be made over to the Free Church, and scarcely anything has since been done to recover this loss in what affects the maintenance of the college. The cost of everything has vastly increased in this time: wages and salaries have everywhere risen along with the price of repairs and furnishing and necessary books. Good friends have added to our funds for bursaries and fellowships, of which we have sufficient; but what is urgently required if the College is to continue and increase its services to the Church (and it already has far more regular students than any other Theological Faculty in Scotland), is an ample endowment, providing for the teaching, for needed repairs, and for the Library. It need not be thought that the University will furnish the required revenue, for it has nothing to spare, and the College, under any scheme, is to remain the property of the Church, devoted to its sacred purposes. Within a generation more than twenty new Chairs have been endowed within the University, several of them by members of our own Church, and all such benefactions are applauded; but why does no one think of endowing the Chair of Practical Training, which none of our Universities ever possessed, and which is so vital to the Church's well-being? One man or two or three men together might give us what would secure for all time a provision for the right training of students in their preaching, their pastorate, their care of the young. No worthier memorial for a great public servant like Lindsay or Denney could be imagined than the endowment of the Chairs which they held. The professorships in the Divinity Faculties of the national Universities are now rightly to be thrown open to all churches, so that the best equipped man, whatever his denominational badge, may be secured; but the Church of Scotland is bound to provide teaching in the central things by men whom it chooses and can trust, as knowing its history and its peculiarities of need. So there is no prospect of the cutting down of our staff, and in so wide a field as Theology there is no risk of wasteful duplication. And to this one note should be added. Right through the war and the succeeding years the stipends of professors remained unaltered, whilst other stipends largely increased. A few years ago the Assembly authorised a bonus addition, but the funds from which this has been paid will this year be exhausted; is Glasgow content that these stipends should now fall back to what they were before the War?

In all our Colleges nothing has been more enriching or more educative than the fellowship of the students themselves. Men who have felt lost and lonely in the crowded places of the University have discovered friends on all sides in the kindly family life of the College; and in 1897 a Union was formed for maintaining these old ties. It has a gathering each year on the opening day of the winter session, but its members have continually been planning for their Alma Mater. This memorial volume is one of its achievements in which, thanks to the assiduity of Dr. Buchanan Blake, a register of the classes since 1856 is presented. The Union was largely responsible for the great window on the staircase in memory of Candlish and Drummond and for the portraits of Bruce and Lindsay. A gift from one of its members in the Medical profession secured our first electric lighting. The Union erected a tablet in memory of the sons of the College who fell in the war, and now they are devising plans for the equipment of a Chapel which would at once serve as a memorial of the Union of 1929 and be the centre of the devotional life of the College.

In all our story there is much to record with pride and gratitude, and, if we are true to our opportunity, we may see greater things yet than the past has shown.

THE TRINITY COLLEGE UNION.

This Union was formed in 1897 as an Association of Former Students, to perpetuate and deepen their fellowship, and maintain their interest in their old College. In 1903 those ministers of the United Presbyterian Church, who had taken their Arts Course in Glasgow, were invited to become members, and now a similar invitation is given to those ministers of the former Church of Scotland to join us.

All such are regarded as Members of our Union, and a nominal subscription of one shilling is asked. The Union is grateful to the Principal for his impressive Sketch of our History and feels that a fuller knowledge of our College would lead the Church to take a deeper interest in its well-being, and send their sons in yet larger numbers to fill its classes.

In all, 1410 regular students have passed through our Hall, with a large number of non-regulars from all parts. Of our men, 578 are still on active service.
